- Price trades above 50-day average and testing 200-day average near 880.
- Next resistance levels at 904, 938, and 981 with supports at 857, 828 and 818.
- RSI at 74 indicates overbought but still pointing upward momentum.
- MACD shows fresh bullish crossover with strengthening positive histogram bars.
- Volume surge confirms breakout strength and investor participation.

Technical Overview

The daily structure clearly shows a breakout from the “Falling Channel”, which had been in place since May. This breakout is significant because price has not only pierced the upper trendline but has also managed to close above it with strong volume confirmation, suggesting that the downtrend phase might be ending.

From a Fibonacci perspective, the 50% retracement level at 880 is acting as an immediate hurdle, but a decisive close above this could accelerate the move towards 904 (61.8% retracement) and 938 (78.6% retracement). Beyond this, 981 remains the major resistance level, as it coincides with the previous swing high.

On the moving averages front, price has crossed above the 50-day moving average and is testing the 200-day moving average. If the stock sustains above both averages, it would mark a shift towards a medium-term bullish trend. Conversely, any failure to hold above 857 could bring the stock back into consolidation.

Momentum-wise, RSI at 74 shows the market is in overbought territory. While this reflects strong buying strength, it also warns of possible short-term pullbacks or sideways consolidation before the next leg higher. The MACD bullish crossover supports the bullish case, with the widening histogram indicating strengthening upside momentum.

Volatility is clearly elevated, as seen through wide daily ranges and the chopiness index signaling a strong trending phase after a prolonged consolidation. Traders should be prepared for sharp intraday swings, though the overall technical picture leans positive.
